Dear Mark,

As previously mentioned, I have been detailing and restoring aircraft paintwork for over 20 years, and I am sure I have tested virtually all the aviation protection and detailing products that have come into Australia, or been developed in Australia during this time. Products have improved of course, but I have been generally disappointed with the results as against the claims, particularly durability and a lasting shine or gloss. I was very sceptical when approached by Permagard Aviation.

Permagard claimed to have a range of products specifically designed to withstand and protect aircraft against the harsh flying conditions within Australia.

As I am open to testing most products, I decided to try the Boeing Certified P5000 range of paint restoration and protection products, and have to say after a year of use, have achieved outstanding results.

During this past year, Eye for Detail has been working with Permagard products specifically testing for:

- Paint restoration capabilities
- Durability of the product
- Oxidation retardation
- Gloss level results
- Dirt repellent effects

In all five categories of testing, Permagard out performed what I considered the best industry leading, certified aviation products.

Eye for Detail therefore has no hesitation in recommending Permagard to the aviation sector, in fact we now use Permagard products for most of the aircraft we maintain.

Yours sincerely,

Clive Backhouse
